Athletic Soft Tissue Handicap – Steels Creek – May 10th

Race report.

According to eye-witness reports the weather conditions were not malignant, the typical Steels Creek valley northerly was present but quite gentle. Eighty-two of the ninety-one registered riders made it to the start line. The four-score and two were spread over eight marks, from scratch to twenty-seven minutes. With an average bunch size in excess of ten and calm conditions it was promising to be a fast race. And as is the way with this circuit the majority of gains would be taken in the outbound leg with minimal gains on the return as the down-hill, down-wind leg would even out even the strongest riders.

On paper this group had a good head start but was going to have their work cut out as it was six against the rest. In reality it was tougher still as only half the registered riders actually made it to the start line. The job of Graham Cadd and Ashley Willox wasn't made any easier when Keith Bowen parted company 10k in, leaving the pair to slog it out alone; working together up hill and down dale, through Ashley's leg cramps at the 40k mark and watching their lead diminish with each leg.

At the bell the lead pair still had a good gap and were encourage by positive vibes from Ronnie on the line. At the final turn they still had a lead of around the three minutes; enough of a gap given the assistance of the wind and general downward incline back to the finish - so long as the legs didn't go the way of the road. Encouraged by the size of the gap at the last turn the pair redoubled their effort, Graham exhorting Ashley to keep going. And so it was that the pair held on, the last couple of undulations causing physical and mental anguish as the legs screamed for respite, the brain questioning if all the effort was worth it and the guts in a knot with worry; would they hold the behemoth that was the chasers at bay.

A glance over the shoulder five hundred metres from home (the first for the race) was met with disbelief - nothing but clear road, the pair, led by Graham, crossing the line around 500m clear of the juggernaut that was the combined five-minute plus bunch.

18-minute

A pre-race pep talk from the club captain instilled in the members of this group the importance of staying together and steadily rolling turns. Good advice, advice that was heeded for at least the first half lap even though the undulations on the outbound leg made consistency difficult, some riders underestimating the strength of their own legs creating gaps in the chain on the inclines. Advice from the more experienced in the bunch was both forthcoming and obeyed and any aberrations were quickly quashed. Despite the shared work load a couple of riders were lost on the first outbound leg and another on the return, diminishing the numbers to eight. At the first turn the time gap to the limit riders was given as four and a half minutes - halving the original lead in one sixth of the race distance spirits were high and the pace increased on the return. At the completion of the first lap the gap was still around the four and a half minute mark.

For the next lap and a half the remaining riders continued to roll. Mick Paull and Darren Rowlinson were casualties at the half way mark, further reducing the numbers to six. The start of the third lap had those left digging in their pockets for sustenance or inspiration, whatever they found there wasn't enough and though they stayed away from the chasers for the final slog out to Steels Creek capture was imminent. At the final turn the gap to the leaders was given as two and a half minutes, the chasers were not far behind.

Not long after the final turn the bunch was swept up by the juggernaut that was the combined five, seven, ten and thirteen minute groups; Brett Robinson, Ken Saxton and Neil Cartledge managing to jump ships as the behemoth swept by. The three regular e-grade riders enjoying the run to the finish with speeds of over 40kph consistently registering on the cycle computers. A moment's anxiety for Neil as a touch of wheels just in front left teeth marks on his heart.

13 minutes

As one of the smaller groups on the day it was going to need to stay together and share the work load evenly and that's how it was as the nine set off in pursuit of the eleven five minutes ahead. Working well together the group took time out of the eighteen minute bunch, encouraged each time they caught and passed a dropped rider in the knowledge that those left were having to work just that little bit harder.

But before they could enjoy the satisfaction of running down the eighteen minute group this group were themselves run down as they climbed to the turn for the bell and the start of the final lap, their solitude interrupted as the ten-minute group came through. The resultant scramble to up the tempo and get on board saw a couple drop away and a couple, including Ben DeJong and Andrew Buchanan, make it onto the bus. A few minutes later the bus became the juggernaut as the combined five and seven-minute bus melded in.

There were some strong legs in this group which threatened to bust it apart on the first run out to Steels Creek but there were experienced heads in the mix as well which managed to keep it together. Seeing the lead car on its way back to complete the first lap just two kilometres into the race sent home the message of just how much work was ahead. By the first turn the strong legs of Peter Stanley, Justin Murphy, Glen Pascall and Andrew Neilsen had helped take the requisite minute out of the ten-minute group. The high spirits at that knowledge were short lived though, the sight of the five minute bunch as the groups passed by the tennis courts indicated that they were also on the march.

At the conclusion of the first lap the immediate gaps; 7 - 10 and 5 - 7, were pretty much as they had been at the Steels Creek end (as to be expected). But just before race half distance at the second Steels Creek turn, Thorkild Muurholm and Phil Pelgrim brought the remnants of the five-minute bunch up, the two groups amalgamating. Out of the turn the combined group set about chasing down the ten-minute bunch that was just up ahead.

5-minutes

The five minute bunch were quick to get into a regular rotation and quick to fall out of it as the strong legs of Thorkild Muurholm and Phil Pelgrim had the riders on their wheels struggling to get over on the slight inclines. Once the road flattened out the rotation was quickly restored.

The second lap saw fewer members of the bunch rolling through as some members were dropped off and some of the remainder struggled just to hang on to the pace let alone come through to do a turn. At the halfway mark juncture with the seven-minute group added a few willing and able legs to the bunch enabling those that were just hanging on to recuperate and get back into the roll. With the added assistance of the extra workers the combined group set about chasing down the ten-minute bunch that was just up ahead.

As is the way with the return leg the hare stayed just out of reach. The gap coming down enough over the last few inclines before the bell that Krishna, avatar of Vishnu, was born soon after the start of the final sixteen kilometres.

Toward the final turn the big group continually split as the likes of Thorkild and Phil continued to surge over the hills in pursuit of the two marks still on the road ahead, the group reforming as the road levelled again. At the last turn the gap to the leaders was given as three minutes, surely it was too much of a gap over the fast return - it was. As the leaders powered out of the last turn half a dozen riders failed to make the cut but it was still a large group that stormed over the second last mark as they climbed up from the tennis courts, a couple of the eighteen-minute men scrambling aboard for the run home.

Down hill, down wind, the return leg doesn't provide a lot of opportunity for riders to get away and that was the way it was as the now combined mass stormed towards the finish. The last couple of hills stretching the bunch to the limits and in some cases beyond as a few finally conceded defeat and let go the elastic band. Despite the attrition it was still a mass of riders that came round the last bend, a closed road seeing the full width of bitumen used as riders tried to find the line that would get them there first (for third - ed.). It was Graeme Parker, rumoured to be pushing 53-12, who wound it up hardest and prevailed, followed home by a cluster of five-minute men; Leigh Bailey, Trevor Coulter, Nick Tapp, Martin Stalder and Thorkild.

Cresting the first rise and onto the course proper one of the first things the three-minute group saw were two of the limit riders, and the lead car, making their way toward Steels Creek - for the second time - not a good sign. But with some strong legs and thirteen riders in the group there was hope. Unfortunately the strong legs, combined with a lack of handicap racing experience, was the undoing of the group. On the flatter sections of the course the group worked well together, but each incline saw disarray as the not-so-strong riders struggled to get over the top of the "slow line". The pace line reversing on a couple of occasions as the stronger riders doubled back in an effort to maintain rotation and a fast pace.

For two and a quarter laps the three-minute group essentially held it together, alternating between a slickly operating group and a mass of shouted instructions, as they chased down those who had set off before them. Half way to the final turn scratch came through and pacelines, rolling turns, and Latvian loops were forgotten as the three-minute men were content to let the scratchies set the tempo and take the wind.

scratch

Twenty-seven minutes and over a lap down on the limit riders the eleven scratchmen were going to have to do some serious motoring to feature in the finish. Once released the bunch knuckled down and worked well together, but as is the way with the undulating Steels Creek course the inclines brought about a little disruption in the rotation as discrepancies in strengths were highlighted, the descents seeing order returned. A puncture for Phil Cavaleri on the return to complete the first lap and Damiano Amborosini losing contact on the way out for the second time brought the working bunch down to nine.

Into the second lap it became apparent that there were a few strong riders in the group, regularly taking their turn at the front, the others putting in where they could. Peter Howard was prominent at the front putting in some big turns each time the group began to struggle. Collected stragglers doing all they could to simply hang on as the final group on the road powered along at around 41kph.

With the exception of the odd straggler, and the crossovers at either end of the course, the scratch bunch didn't see any of the rest of the race until half way out to Steels Creek for the last time where they came upon the remainder of the three-minute bunch with their entourage of dropped riders from earlier marks. A delicate passing manoeuvre (to avoid crossing white lines) enabled most of the three-minute riders to latch onto the passing train and hitch a ride to the far turnaround. A surge by Gerry Donnelly on one of the rises before the Steel Creek city limits was matched by Ian Milner and Frank Nyhuis, the three enjoying a kilometre of so of pain before the chase reunified the group. The chase putting a few of the weaker 3-minutemen in trouble and off the back, but it was still a large group that took the final turn four and a half minutes behind the limit riders and one and a half behind the amalgamated 5 - 18 minute bunch.

Neutral was not a consideration through the last turn as the leaders put the hammer down in an attempt to sort the workers from the drones. The effort successfully splitting the bunch, a couple of the original scratch group and most of the earlier mark riders finding themselves on the wrong side of the break. Wayne Doherty and Quentin Frayne being two who were on the right side along with around seven of the original scratch group. On the pinch after the tennis courts Gerry Donnelly had another go at shaking the tree - only succeeding in getting himself and Quentin fifty metres up the road, Rob Amos and Ian Milner joining the pair at the top of the hill. The foursome staying away for a couple of kilometres before the remnants of the first group around the cones reeled them in. Meanwhile a hundred metres down the road another group of eight (those left behind at the turn) including Olivier Pomie, Kevin Starr and Frank along with the scratchmen Phil Thompson and Boyd Friis were working hard to regain the ground lost on the turn, Boyd doing some huge turns to see the two groups reunited four kilometres from the finish.

The long open stretches around mid-way back provided no encouragement to the group - nothing but bitumen all the way to the horizon, and the mood in the group shifted from optimism to resignation, the tactics from pursuit to preservation.

Darren Sayers was not going to be slow to react this week, taking the initiative to open the sprint early as the road started its way up to the finish. His efforts obtaining him and Ian M., a small gap as the road bent round and the finish line came into view ... as the finish line came into view ... as the finish line came into view. With his heart rate at the maximum and the finish line just coming into view Darren's legs began to fail as did Ian's and the older and wiser heads began to prevail. Mark Wallace had Gerard Donnelly marked as the man to beat and with this in mind set off up the right hand side of the (closed) road to gain the advantage, Quentin Frayne on his wheel. A quick check up the road revealed an on-coming car that necessitated a review of the plan. Diving back to the left, momentum and advantage lost, Mark had to settle for second to Gerard's fastest time. Quentin and Kevin Starr flying the three-minute flag finishing within a couple of bike lengths of the scratch pair.

Post wrap

The margins at the finish were; around thirty seconds between the winners and the race for third, the race for fastest time less than a minute behind the race for third.
